

Participant 3 Notes

- Looks for the job he wants to apply to
- Found a job at Intel that uses Workday
- Since it was his first time applying to Intel, he made a new account
 - it is not fun having to make account just for one job application
- He autofills the application using the autofill with resume option
 - for some part of the application, it is better to autofill
 - he used his resume using Latex so better for auto filling
- While making the account, he found out he already applied to Intel before and has an account
- He feels fine giving information even though it's optional
- He often times need to re-write his application bc autofill did not work correctly
- While answering the questions, he need to read it carefully to make sure it is correct
- When he don't know what to say, he just states N/A
- There's always an option to decline to state but he always fills it out bc he wants to be transparent to the company
- It still shows errors so he needs to fix it again
- The most tedious part is the work experience part
 - he need to go back to his resume and copy and paste it again
- At last, checks if his application is fully correct
 - then submits it
- He would like it if there is one single account for all job applications
